Career Corner:

Adam Mayer,
Director of Career Counseling

What's an “information interview” and why should I pursue one? An information interview is a meeting between you and someone whose job appeals to you. While everyone seems busy, some professionals will make time if you ask, and lots of people like to talk about themselves, so this technique is a no-brainer. Where to begin? Identify desirable occupations, use your network to develop a list of names and write a compelling letter explaining why you're interested in meeting. Make the meeting about them and their careers, not about your job search. You're collecting information. Give people the opportunity to help you. Some might.
