‘Green Teams’ Practice What They Preach

“Green Teams” sponsored by the PSEG Institute for Sustainability Studies branched out this summer, advocating for communities to adapt greener lifestyles and for industries to innovate greener ways of doing business. They connected to science at Princeton's Plasma Physics Lab and took their message global, joining sustainability initiatives at the United Nations, and dug in at the grassroots level in a city park. With the group ending its summer program to reduce the state’s ecological footprints on August 7, Rick Thigpen, senior vice president, PSEG, praised their work to create sustainable, livable and resilient communities and industry. International Conference Takes Communication Back to the Basics

The digital news labs and television studios of the School of Communication and Media got back to the basics this summer when a diverse group of people working in visual fields brought their pens and paper to Montclair State University for an international forum on graphic recording and facilitation. Live drawing and note taking shared the stage with the experts in this creative field. As Thomas E. Franklin, an assistant professor at Montclair State and award-winning photographer, opened the conference on July 31 with a keynote on the convergence of art, journalism and visual storytelling, graphic recorders translated his words into images and text on large sheets of paper. An increasing number of organizations are incorporating visual facilitation into their meetings and strategic planning. [View full story]

Tara Temple Named Head Athletic Trainer

Temple will oversee the sports medicine operation for the Red Hawks’ 18 sports. Temple comes to Montclair State following eight years at Stevens Institute of Technology, the last two as the assistant athletic director for Sports Medicine and Student-Athlete Wellness where she supervised the sports medicine aspect for all 26 athletic teams, serving nearly 600 student-athletes annually. "I am excited to join the Sports Medicine Staff at Montclair State University," said Temple. "Montclair has tremendous reputation in the sports medicine field for many years and I look forward to working with the staff and the student-athletes." [View full story]

Alumni Spotlights

Jan Price '74, '77 MA

After a successful career, alumna Jan Price '74, '77 MA has recently retired from her position as the national director of Medical Science Liaisons for Women’s HealthCare and Neurology at Bayer HealthCare. She has recently completed docent training at the Stickley Museum at Craftsman Farms and plans on spending some of her time volunteering. Price’s hard work over the past years has not gone unnoticed. In the spring of 2018, unbeknownst to her, several women on her staff nominated Price for the HealthCare Businesswomen’s Association’s Luminary Award representing Bayer. The award recognizes individuals who have had more than 20 years of professional industry experience, actively mentors and sponsors others, and is an example of transformational leadership. As he took the stage as Supreme Court Justice Antonin Scalia on opening night of the off-Broadway performance of The Originalist in July 2018, Edward Gero was empowered to know that Jerome Rockwood, his old acting professor from Montclair State University was in the audience. “That he was there, at age 91, meant a lot to me,” Gero says. “He had such a major impact on the development of my career.” The role of Justice Scalia, which was written for Gero, offered his first return to the New York stage in 35 years. Gero, who describes himself a loner prone to long moments of reflection, found acceptance with acting while attending high school in Madison, New Jersey. [View full story]
